Certain human beings went pale and started drinking milk. As people advanced northward into less sunny regions, their children became liable to grow up with rickety bones. Pink skins evolved, which admitted ultraviolet rays and promoted the formation of Vitamin D, a factor in bone growth. Milk, too, was good for bones, and a bizarre genetic mutation enabled children to go on drinking milk after weaning. These genetic peculiarities may have taken thousands of years to become normal in a population, so their origin is obscure. Some paleolithic lived in the steppes of ~~that~~ the Ukraine in Eastern Europe, where they began taming horses about 6400 Yrs ago, later as speakers of URALIC, and especially Indo-European languages became as important as their mounts. But milk-drinking relatives, speakers of Proto-Semitic languages living with dairy cattle in the hills of northern Mesopotamia, were the first to impose upon their neighbors
